CHALKBOARDS

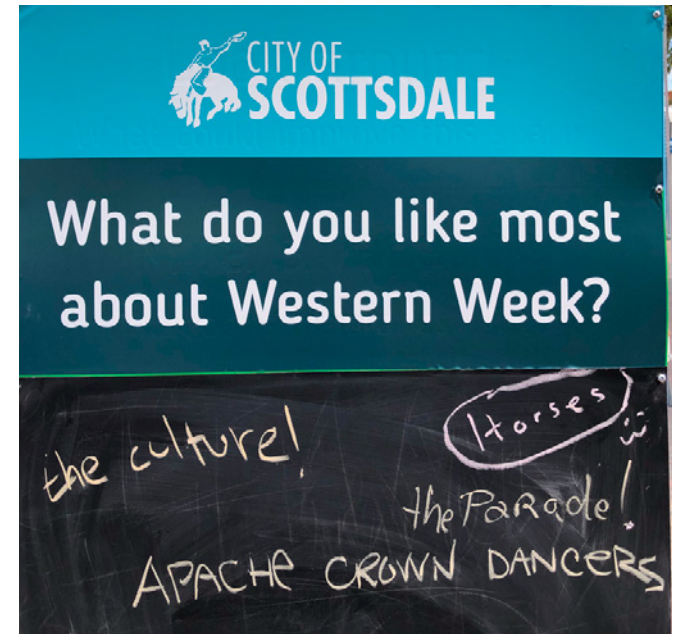

When we staff the portals and interact with passers-by, the chalkboards receive more “real” responses (e.g. ones that answer our question, rather than random things like ‘Josh wuz here’). We got some great ones this weekend: horses, music, art, and culture were mentioned several times.

SWEEPSTAKES & DIGITAL ENGAGEMENT

We received our first real suggestion via text message, and we’re excited to explore that option more. It’s worked beautifully in cities like Saint John, Canada.

I would like to offer a prize to this respondent, as promised on the ideaPortals. In our next meeting, let’s decide on something that Scottsdale can offer, and I will reach out to the author.

I believe the chalkboards are limiting the number of digital submissions we’re receiving. Let’s consider separating the chalkboards from the portals to test this assumption.

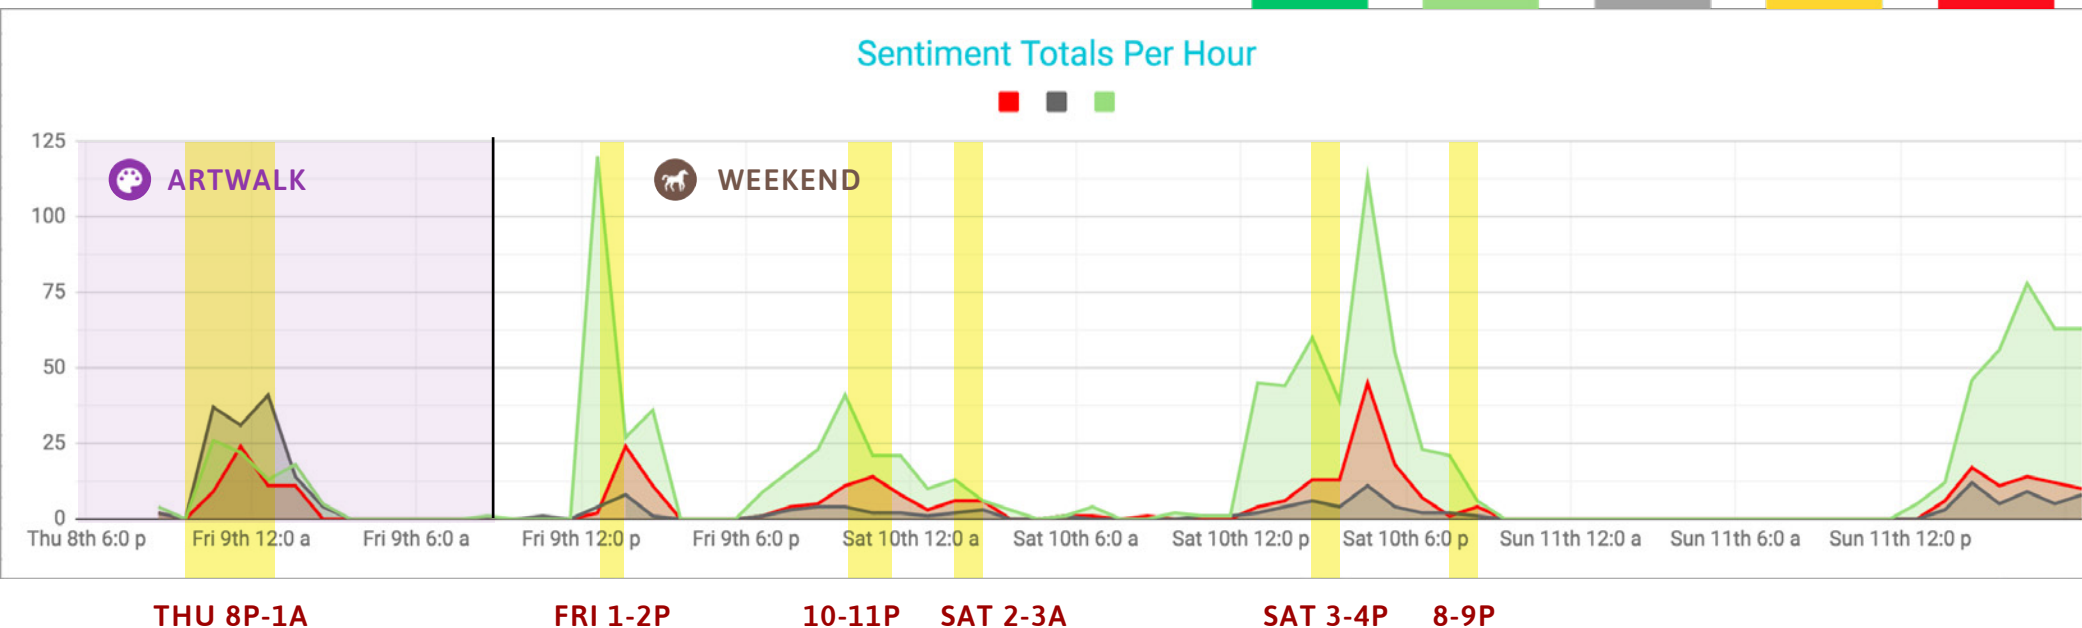

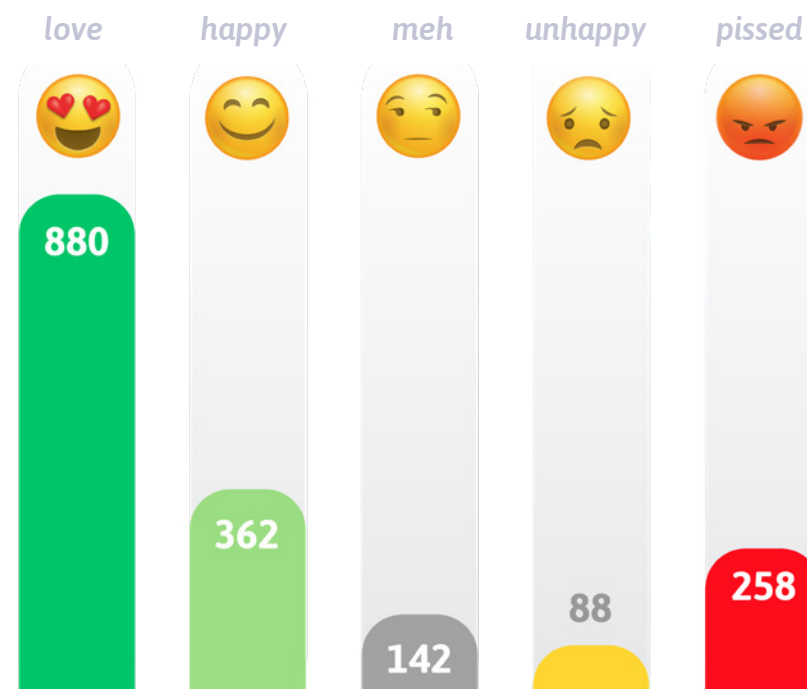

Foraging native plant Scottsdale used to be named for. The plant's still growing right here by the Farmers Market, and it's the original base of horchata.

SENTIMENT RESULTS (ALL PORTALS)

It's fascinating to see how our 1,730 responses stacked up (right; link to raw data). Love far outperformed all others, happy slightly beat pissed, and meh just barely squeaked ahead of sad.

Interestingly, we notice a clear signal on Thursday evening: high rates of non-positive reactions, indicating the Art Walk experience can likely be improved in a few ways.

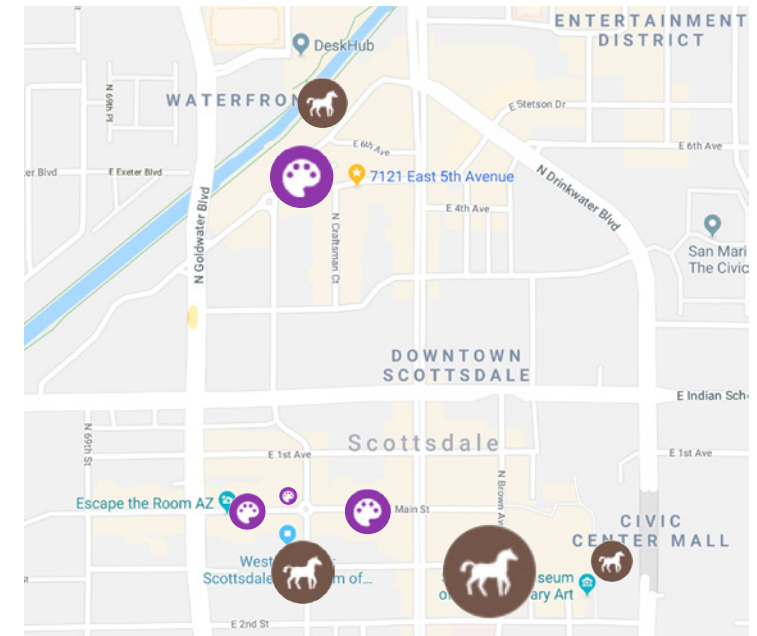

HIGH NON-POSITIVE RATIOS HIGHLIGHTED BELOW

This prototypish heatmap (right; link to full map) shows relative portal activity by location, with more button presses correlating to larger icons.

-  Art Walk (Thursday 6pm to Friday 9am)
-  Weekend (Friday 9am to Sunday 5pm)

Below, the high non-positive ratios from the previous page are stacked against portal engagements to highlight trends by location. In the future, we hope to assign GPS coordinates to increase the accuracy of our data.

Big questions: Scottsdale's answers

WHAT'S MOST VALUABLE TO THE CITY OF SCOTTSDALE?

Data drives your decisions. It's been a pleasure measuring & analyzing these unique data sets so far. I believe clear patterns will continue to emerge as we poll city-goers in ever-increasing methods, times and places.

By identifying high rates of non-positive sentiment in realtime, cities can quickly learn where lie the best opportunities to improve citizen experience, earning a better reputation along the way for actively listening and learning.

You have already positioned Scottsdale as a pioneer in smart city initiatives—continue to build on that momentum with citizen engagement and you'll become even more attractive to individuals and businesses.

WHAT DO YOU WANT IDEAPORTALS TO BECOME?

Brent had the amazing idea of leveraging the power of augmented reality to propose public works (advertising example below). Let's define our assumptions and test them with low-tech solutions—for example, printed renderings on transparent sheets.

Big questions: Our answers

WHAT DO WE WANT IDEAPORTALS TO BECOME?

We need to continue experimenting with this method of civic engagement. In this increasingly technological world, it's going to be imperative that we innovate new channels of communication with citizens and reframe the citizen-government relationship to be fun and sought after.

More than anything, I want ideaPortals to motivate citizens to contribute their thoughts, opinions, and ideas to big questions that cities face—examples span both operations and policy. One in particular: the recent debate over whether shared bikes are good or bad—ideaPortals can be used to reframe the conversation from “good or bad” to brainstorming common ground.

I also want to pioneer other realms of interaction, such as location-based Instagram story polls (above) which are currently drawing roughly 22% engagement.

Big questions: Our answers

WHAT DO IDEAPORTALS DO BEST?

In the early stage, ideaPortals are best when present in the natural environment. We're brightly colored and easy to spot, which is key for drawing attention.

In their current form, ideaPortals are best at collecting sentiment and open-ended suggestions from a wide variety of people.

We're in a phase in which solution testing and brand awareness are our primary focuses, so we don't want to build more than we need until people are actively asking how to get involved.

With that in mind, there are some improvements that could really benefit the data.

HOW CAN WE FULFILL THE VISION AND PROVIDE VALUE TO CITIES?

If a goal is to drive data quality, consider staffing each ideaPortal with a volunteer facilitators at strategic times to guide and encourage proper user interaction and generate valuable conversations—just like we experienced firsthand at Western Week.

If a goal is to increase data volume, the simple answer is to refine the design, produce more portals and place them in high-traffic/strategic areas.

ideaPortals allow cities to tap into the collective consciousness of their citizenry. This very real “hive mind” effect, only attainable with large numbers of participants, a powerful tool for discovering valuable patterns of thought in public opinion.

Thank you, City of Scottsdale.

We look forward to our

With love,
